

I think that places have a big influence on us. Our style of thinking, how we act, and how we feel about things may all be affected by where we live. My career has been greatly affected by my upbringing in a rural area of (state name). It was a society that adhered to patriarchal standards and traditional gender inequality. Even though it had never before manifested in its real and clear form, social and cultural standards had enabled it to do so. My hometown's patriarchal culture favored male superiority in all spheres, whereas women were viewed as inferior despite being better than males in each way. Since I'm a girl, the community's leader and the rest of society accused my father of breaking their laws when my parents wanted to arrange for my schooling. Yet my father didn't waver in his decision and let me join the school. Throughout every academic phase of my life, I could hear conversations behind me about how my father disobeyed the leader and how brave I was to go to school. My interest in social science was sparked by listening to unending conversations about my society and its authoritarian norms. Several such events and the need for societal change were discussed in the social science courses. Yet nobody took action. As a result, I acquired a pragmatic perspective on social issues and studied for bachelor's and master's degrees in Social Work from XYZ University and ABC University, respectively, that combined coursework with learning from the community. Beyond the classroom, these universities provided me with wonderful opportunities to interact with individuals from different cultural backgrounds and see how our surroundings shape us.

I interned at a few public centers in India while earning my master's degree, which allowed me to comprehend the significance of advancing education and obliterating man-centric practices. Each angle that shapes the children's convictions ought to be considered to work on their future. This thought truly intrigued me, so I attempted to sort out some way to comprehend it better. I included this thought in my master's dissertation, which was named "xxxxxxxxxx." It was a qualitative research project that managed the subjects of discrimination, prevalence, and concealment while focusing on individuals in my hometown.

I worked with various community centers in India for a considerable length of time subsequent to completing my master's. It helped me see everything in another light. The mix of orientation, sexuality, authority, and financial status greatly impacted how people were dealt with and brought about social issues. In those five years, I got the opportunity to visit different states and evaluate their circumstances, especially in the rural areas. My openness to numerous social orders, customs, and people propelled me to direct independent research named "xxxxx," "xxxxx," and "xxxxx." They both received widespread attention after their publications in an international research journal. After the publication, I even had the opportunity to take part in discussions at several universities in India, which provided the greatest setting for me to hone my interpersonal and communication abilities. While visiting colleges worked on my adaptability, doing research assisted me with fostering my problem-solving capacities, reasoning, and critical thinking skills.

While I worked, it became clear to me that the majority of a society's members carry out and create its initiatives and activities. I heard that from a local community leader where I worked. It dismisses the real factors affecting minorities and depicts them as oppressed. My professional discoveries and experiences enlivened me to get a PhD in (name of the course). By featuring the perspectives of the mistreated, this subject of study will enhance my ability to examine social orders while being aware of my own beliefs and values.

Tracking down the right country and college to go to will assist me in fathoming the subject all the more completely and getting the right exposure. I have found that choosing Australia is the most ideal choice after going through various websites and articles. The fact that this nation offers top-notch education and numerous opportunities for research is what initially drew me there. With some of the best colleges in the world, the country is renowned for its contributions to research. The multicultural society of Australia can also help me to solidify my notions and ideas and encourage me to conduct further research.

The quality of education, research, and expertise of XYZ University in Australia are well known. My academic understanding of the topic will improve due to this doctoral programme. Further, with the assistance of knowledgeable faculty, I can develop my research skills and learn more about the methodologies and research strategies. Besides that, I'm excited to conduct research under the guidance of Prof. (Name), who has received multiple accolades for their work. Hence, by studying in this program, I intend to increase my theoretical comprehension, analytical abilities, and awareness of social issues in addition to my subject-matter expertise.

I expect to function as an academician subsequent to finishing the PhD studies, splitting my time among teaching and empowering youth while growing my insight through participating in ongoing research studies. If I get the chance to join XYZ University, I will contribute not just my intellectual, management, and reasoning skills but also my eagerness for learning. Your university will be a magnificent stage for me to accomplish my goals.
